

Philosophical implications:

- While we grow, our brains do learn to be a better predictor of the world & a better strategist for personal gain. After the hard line, we are learning to drive our brain better, in the face of the particular strengths & weaknesses that our particular brain develops.
- ~~off as the~~ Each individual ends up with different strengths, weaknesses and bias, from env. & learning exps.
• To a large part, it's the extent to which we learn to work with our particular strengths & weaknesses that defines our success & happiness in the long term.
- In essence this explains that different individuals have different starting positions. We cannot hope to expect to have the same inherent abilities as another. ~~But~~ Being used that our situation is different to another is both fruitless & misguided.
